Child and Adolescent Health Service
Community Ambassador

About me

I am a community advocate with over 16 years of experience working alongside culturally and linguistically diverse communities in Western Australia. As the founder of the Hazara Women Support Network and a long-term volunteer and leader across multiple community initiatives, my work focuses on strengthening inclusion, amplifying community voices, and improving access to essential services.

My lived experience, combined with my professional background, has given me a deep understanding of the barriers many families face, particularly when navigating complex systems like health services.

How I want to have an impact

I want to ensure that culturally diverse families feel seen, heard, and supported within the health system. Too often, gaps in communication, cultural understanding, and trust lead to unequal outcomes.

As a CAHS Ambassador, I aim to bridge that gap by bringing forward community voices, strengthening trust between families and services, and advocating for more culturally responsive and accessible care.

Why I'm passionate about community representation and inclusive child health services

Every child deserves equal access to quality healthcare, regardless of their background. I am passionate about ensuring that no family is left behind due to language barriers, cultural differences, or lack of awareness.

Representation matters. When communities see themselves reflected in systems, trust grows, and outcomes improve. I am committed to advocating for services that listen, adapt, and respond to the diverse needs of all families.
